THIRTEEN WAYS OF LOOKING AT INSTITUTIONAL HISTORY

Building Varying Digital Narratives from Interconnected Science Archives

Over the past decade, there have been many efforts to streamline the accessibility of archival material on the web. This includes display of oral history interviews and archival records, and making their content more amenable to searches. The challenge, however, is not just putting out the data, but of building spaces where historians, journalists, the scientific community and the general public can see stories emerging from the linking of seemingly disparate records.

Join us to learn of different ways in which researchers, students and the public can all take archival material and form multiple narratives around the same records.
